Did you know that your company is currently paying for a behavioral healthcare system that is not meeting its substance abuse and mental health needs?

Mental health and substance use disorder has risen to the top of employers' most costly and prevalent conditions.

Consistently, there are smaller payments made to behavioral health providers and higher out-of-network use for patients with mental health and substance use disorders.

With increasing suicide rates, opioid overdose deaths, and mental health conditions, employers must better engage with their brokers, plans, and providers to ensure that employees and family members have access to timely, high quality mental health services and treatment.
